Baur spent two fire seasons as a lookout in the remote wilderness of Montana. During that time, she lived in a small cabin with no running water or electricity. Her only contact with the outside world was a radio. She spent her days watching for smoke and reporting any fires she saw.

Fire Season Field Notes is more than just a story about firefighting. It is also a story about the natural world and the human experience. Baur writes about the beauty of the wilderness, the challenges of living in isolation, and the rewards of finding solitude and peace in nature.

Fire Season Field Notes is a must-read for anyone who loves the outdoors, who is interested in the human experience, or who simply wants to read a well-written and unforgettable story.
