During the Middle Ages, blue was a popular color for stained glass windows in cathedrals. The medieval alchemists believed that blue was the color of the philosopher's stone, and they associated it with wisdom and knowledge.

In the late Middle Ages, blue became a popular color for clothing, especially among the nobility. The wealthy would often wear blue velvet and silk garments, and they would use blue dyes to color their hair and beards.

Chapter 4: Blue in the Renaissance

During the Renaissance, blue became a popular color for paintings. The Renaissance artists used blue to create realistic scenes of the natural world, and they also used it to create symbolic works of art.

Some of the most famous paintings from the Renaissance that feature blue include Leonardo da Vinci's "Mona Lisa" and Raphael's "The School of Athens."
